On the way home from the end-point of the Rajalta Rajalle-hiihto in Tornio, I traveled to Oulu by bus and then took the train to Helsinki. Fortunately, my layover in Oulu was a couple of hours, allowing some exploration of the city, which is surprisingly lively given its far north locale.

Oulu is a seaside town and the day that I was there was clear and beautiful, which makes for good picture taking.
And then it was off to Helsinki, where I arrived five hours later. I took this next picture when I got off the train. This is the boarding/departure area of Helsinki’s central train station. So that you can have some other views of the train station, I’ve also included two pictures taken this past summer not long after we arrived.
And another view.
